the higher the degree of industrialization, the higher the share of the population in the service sector. This is a general trend that is observed in all developed countries. The share of the population in the service sector is a good indicator of the level of economic development. The higher the share, the higher the level of economic development. This is because the service sector is a more advanced sector than the manufacturing sector. It requires more education and training, and it is more labor-intensive. Therefore, a higher share of the population in the service sector indicates a higher level of economic development.
